

Redfin Relocation

Executive Summary

Relocating buyers and sellers are good customers for Redfin. Relocating buyers have a 7.3% higher price point than the average Redfin buyer ($557,768 vs. $519,855). With an estimated 30%+ tour-to-close rate, 40% higher than the average, Redfin makes an estimated $970 more gross profit per deal- a 7.3% gross margin bump- with a relocation client. Contact-to-close rates are also 40%+ higher for both relocating buyers and sellers.

Redfin is uniquely positioned to win relocating customers because we have a national network of employee agents and end-to-end technology. Despite this, we are not converting as many relocating customers as we could because we lack relocation-focused agent events, website features, referral fee policies, and partnerships.

Our Immediate Recommendations: We seek approval on new policies and a new event, a Relocation Coordinator position, and $260,000 to pursue the following strategies in tandem. The sum of our individual recommendations equates to an additional $8M+ in 2017 revenue, but we assume 25% duplication of incremental gains and we anticipate closer to $6M+.

| Recommendation | Investment | 2017 Rev. Projection |
|--|------------|----------------------|
| Contact conversion and improved customer experience | | |
| Improve Identification of Relocates in Systems | ~$0 | $0 |
| Implement Redfin Referral Fee Policy | ~$0 | $500K-$1M |
| Adjust Agent Events, Roles, and Education | ~$0 | $2-$3M |
| Improve Website UX for Relocates | $50K | $1-$3M |
| Contact generation | | |
| Relocation Management Company Partnership Most Strongly Recommended | $50K+ | $1-$4M |
| Consumer Marketing | $20K | $1.5M |
| Business Ambassador Program | $140K | $240-$720K |

Future Recommendation: After we have rolled out the strategies above and have greater internal expertise on relocation, we recommend that Redfin revisits becoming a corporate relocation management company (RMC). The magnitude of the investment and revenue generation potential is akin to our investment in a mortgage product.

About the Relocation Customer

Relocating customers are a large segment of good contacts with different needs

“Relocatee” refers to anyone moving from one market to another. In addition to converting faster and better, we see anecdotally that relocatees move more frequently. They fall into Redfin’s demographic sweet spot: the average relocatee is highly educated, has an average income of $90,000-130,000 and is 36-40 years old (2013 Employee Relocation Council report).

Relocatees have three traits that make them different from people moving within the same city:

1. They don’t know where to move in their new city.
2. Their actual move is more expensive and stressful.
3. They are less likely to have an agent or referral to an agent in their new city.

Job driven, employee managedincludes moves where employee is receiving a lump-sum payment from a corporate entity*

Relocatees make up an estimated 22% of home buyers nationally. This includes both job-driven (14%) and other relocation types (8%), and 40% of job-driven relocations are managed by Relocation Management Companies (RMCs). RMCs, such as Cartus, coordinate services like temporary housing, movement of household goods, and brokerage. They make money both by charging a fee to employers and charging 25-50% referral fees to vendors. See Appendix 1 for more on RMCs.

Relocating Home Buyers are Under-Represented at Redfin

Our 2015 Brand Survey shows that only 16% of Redfin buyers are relocating versus 22% of home buyers nationwide. This may be largely related to Redfin having no affiliation with RMCs, but we also fail to target other potential relocating contacts and convert them as well as we could. If Redfin grew its relocation business to reflect the national market, we would generate an additional $12.1M in revenue, $4.5M in gross profit and gain 0.55% in gross margins.

Contact Conversion and Improved Customer Experience

We can increase the conversion rate and improve the customer experience of relocating home buyers and sellers who contact Redfin by:

- Identifying them in Agent Tools
- Creating a policy for 3rd party relocation referrals
- Creating relocation-specific pay for DWAs and creating a new Relocation Coordinator role
- Adding relocation-focused content and features to the Redfin website

Improve Identification of Relocates in Agent Tools

Currently, Redfin does not meaningfully identify relocatees. We want to find and measure them to better ensure they get the right service and to inform future relocation-focused strategies. There is a change currently on the engineering roadmap to prompt Agents to complete a mandatory close-out box after a first tour or listing consultation. This box is intended to better capture key information about our customer's needs once an Agent has a meaningful interaction. We recommend that there is a "Relocation Status" checkbox added to this close-out. Agent education on the tool should be rolled out with the upcoming Key Moments training.

Create 3rd Party Referral Fee Policy

Redfin lacks a clear policy on referral fees. Referral fees are requested by non-Redfin agents or RMCs who wish to refer relocating customers to Redfin in exchange for compensation. REOPs Managers and Agents typically handle these inquiries inconsistently or avoid them altogether. This results in lost opportunity, confusion in the field, and inconsistency across the brand. We receive an estimated 500-1,000 referral fee inquiries each year. We recommend establishing the following written policy on Fishnet, which only allows for deals with 15%+ gross margins:

In the event that an outside agent or firm (such as a relocation company) wishes to introduce a customer to a Redfin agent in exchange for a referral fee, Redfin can accept the client if the referring agent or firm agrees to a maximum fee per the table below. In addition to the referral fee, Redfin will still offer a $500 Redfin Refund to the customer. If an agreement is made, the customer's corresponding "Relocation Status" should be updated, written Market Manager approval obtained, and a custom commission split should be documented in Agent Tools for Accounting's reference.

| Home Price Range | Maximum Referral Fee |
|---------------------|----------------------|
| $450,000-$549,999 | 25% |
| $550,000-$649,999 | 35% |
| $650,000-$749,999 | 45% |
| $750,000+ | 49% |

Engineering should automate changes to the customer refund/commission to record the referral fee. REOPs should be informed of the new policy via a Market Manager and direct email to Agents. An estimated $500K-$1M in revenue will be gained in the first year of implementation and should grow with overall revenue thereafter. To start, we recommend doing referral fee deals on the buy side only, due to complications around sales for RMC customers; we also currently have almost no listing referral fee inquiries.

Adjust Agent Events, Roles, and Education

Deal Writing Agents: Agents report that relocatees tour homes inefficiently at the start of their search because they have not yet narrowed their neighborhood focus. We recommend creating a new event called a “Neighborhood Consultation” that would delight customers, reduce customer search time and increase tour-to-close conversion. We think the event will, at minimum increase conversion from an estimated 30% to 32%, generating ~200 more closes per year and increasing revenue by $2M.

This event would default to a three-hour appointment and pay $150. Eliminating event pay for otherwise unproductive tours will offset most of the new expense attributed to a Neighborhood Consultation. The purpose of the event is to book time with a local Agent to tour the features of a local market as opposed to tour homes for purchase. Agents should be trained to identify relocation customers at pre-tour phone calls to determine whether a Neighborhood Consultation or tour is more appropriate for their first meeting. Agents would also have to check the mandatory Relocation Status close-out box in order to receive the event pay. This would trigger a notification for follow-up in the support or Relocation Coordinator queue and the inquiry marked with a unique icon to highlight the customer as relocating.

The new event should be rolled out in test markets with a high volume of relocatees. If we find a decrease in tours and/or conversion increase justifies new event pay as we predict, we would make this change nationally. We should communicate via a Redfin Academy course our findings that relocation clients have different needs, higher close rates and higher average sale prices than our typical customer.

Support Agents and Relocation Coordinators: Support Agents rarely book both a tour and listing consult for the same customer. This is an incentive-related problem that applies broadly, but it is a particularly acute issue with relocating customers. This is both because relocatees are unfamiliar with their destination city and because Support Agents don’t know DWAs or booking protocols outside their market.

We recommend creating a HUB-based Relocation Coordinator (RC) role. The RC will be an expert in booking all event types for any Redfin market and will be familiar with our relocation-specific resources, such as Opportunity Score and neighborhood pages. Support Agents and Tour Coordinators will route relocation calls to the RC who could set up the appropriate events in both regions. At first, this might be a part time position for 3-4 Support Agents. Alternatively, if the proposed Redfin VIP program is implemented, the role could be handled by a VIP Agent. The VIP program has also specified an algorithm-based tool which would allow a VIP Agent or RC to find and schedule the right agent in any market. We strongly support the development of this tool.

Improve Website UX for Relocatees

Reduce Friction for Customers to Contact Agents in Another Market

We don’t cleanly service a client who has worked with Redfin in one market and wants to buy in another. This customer is surprisingly common. 5% of all tour requests come from customers who have an assigned agent in a different market. We also receive 1,500 change agent requests per year indicating that a customer is looking in a different area. Simplifying the process for these customers could increase the number of successful contacts. We project our proposed changes would increase tour and agent requests by up to 10% and generate another 290 deals and $3M in revenue. Implementation would cost ~$30,000.

We need to reduce friction for customers trying to contact agents in a new market. Users are confused when an agent from the old market shows up on the Listing Detail Page in a new market. We should remove this agent from the view. Also, clients can't be assigned to more than one buy-side agent and can only submit Agent Requests to one agent at a time. For example, if a customer has a Buy-side Agent in Market A, they can't submit a contact request for a Listing Agent in Market B. The only way to contact an agent in another market is to submit a change agent request, which is not intuitive, as evidenced by the fact that 80% of the VIP pilot program inquiries were requests for agents in new markets. We should allow a client to easily submit an inquiry to an agent in another market and we should route the request to a Relocation Coordinator. These changes will take a few weeks of engineering time and are now prioritized under Q4 Teams and Projects.

Relocation Pages and Tools

There's no mention of "Relocation" on the site and we don't highlight relocatee-specific content. Changing this may convert more relocatees already on our site, and it will also serve as a building block for our contact-generation strategies.

Need-to-haves: Necessary and easy steps we can take today. Implementation would cost ~$20,000.

- A Relocation Landing Page with content highlighting our national presence and our ability to coordinate buying and selling in different cities. The page will also be accessible on the site under the tools drop down. To support marketing strategies below, we might make a series of landing pages but with different market names associated.
- Add relocation service providers, such as additional moving companies and temporary housing, to Marketplace, which we are planning to open to all contacts. This will improve conversion for those who have already contacted us: it will give DWAs and RCs something to which we can refer customers. It will also benefit all Redfin customers, not just those relocating.

Nice-to-haves: Relocation customers asked for these features in interviews, but it's hard to justify developing them in the context of relocation alone. However, they tie into other Redfin efforts and could support their case. We would also be building blocks for a future Redfin RMC platform.

- Provide meatier neighborhood guides, similar to what we did for San Diego or what Briggs-Freeman Sotheby's did. The pages would provide a referral point for support agents and DWAs and improve the user experience for non-relocating visitors as well.
- Add relocation milestones, like movers and car shipment, into deal room and home dashboard

Contact Generation

We should increase our volume of relocating customer contacts by:

- Becoming a real estate brokerage partner for MOVE Guides, a tech-forward RMC

- Targeted Consumer Marketing
- A Business Ambassador Program: partnering with corporate talent teams to reach employees

We are most excited about partnering with MOVE Guides, but this is also the solution that we have least control over implementing.

Partner with MOVE Guides

Redfin should become a brokerage partner to MOVE Guides, a modern, customer focused RMC. MOVE Guides would provide relocating home-buyer and seller contacts to Redfin for free, and the relocating customer (or possibly their company) would pay Redfin's commission directly, like any other customer. We believe that Redfin can win access to MOVE Guide's contacts by (1) providing value to their customers with our high NPS and refund, and our great tech interface which is consistent with MOVE Guides' brand, and (2) acting as a national vendor to MOVE Guides, thereby reducing their vendor management burden.

We believe a MOVE Guides partnership would generate $1-4M in revenue in 2017 and grow with Move Guides. A partnership would also both be a great conduit for expansion into international markets and let us get smarter about becoming our own RMC. MOVE Guides shared that last year they only had five home purchases out of 12,000 moves, but we think in reality they just have homeowners transacting outside their system since they do not yet have a brokerage partner. MOVE Guides has something in the pipeline with another broker but did not give us details.

Costs and effort to Redfin would be minimal compared to the revenue generation potential. Becoming MOVE Guide's partner brokerage could require ~$50,000 in Year 1 to create a partnership and handoff system and <$10,000/year after in relationship maintenance. At first we would rely on a manual handoff process, but if volume exceeds expectations, we would likely automate that. These costs exclude the expense of a Relocation Coordinator, a position that will be analogous to a Support Agent, and whose costs are baked into the gross margins. If we pursue the Business Ambassador strategy below, that person could be a relationship management resource. Finally, we would need to train Listing Agents to do relocation transaction-specific paperwork. Based on recent interaction with MOVE Guides, there are also opportunities to bring value to a partnership with other Redfin technology including Crime Grade and map-based home and school search. Any such integrations would require additional engineering time.

If our inherent benefits are not compelling enough to convince MOVE Guides to partner with us, we should offer to become a MOVE Guides customer ourselves and pay for access to their platform for our highest-value relocating home buyers (top 25% or 723 people). We could justify this cost if MOVE Guides was generating ~240 Redfin buy-side closes per year, which is easily attainable if they actively promote us and integrate us into their map, but a stretch if they only passively add us to the platform as a vendor. Redfin should also consider using MOVE Guides' service for our own new hires to allow us to see their service through the customer's eyes.

Other RMC Partnerships to consider: We should also keep Urbanbound and PLUS on our radar. These two are a reasonable fit because they market themselves as having better technology, lower fees and better customer value. However, we cannot partner today because of their 35% referral fees and requirements of a relocation department and very extensive relocation experience.

Targeted Consumer Marketing

The best opportunities to target relocatees are:

- Facebook campaigns based on a lookalike audience of closed relocation customers.
- Marketing emails to people who live in one area and are searching for home in another.
- Use the merchandising framework to target relocating customers with relocation-focused messaging and content.
- Targeted military mailers to buyers and sellers based on VA loan addresses, VA home buying classes and a VA-specific landing page to direct contacts from classes and mailers.

With a $20,000 investment, we could drive 500+ high-yield relocation contacts through email campaigns and digital advertising, generating $1.5M in revenue. We have already performed one email marketing experiment and that team is excited to try more. Contacts from these campaigns would be routed to our Relocation Coordinator.

Mike Demello in Hawaii is testing mailers and home buying classes. We should support his effort by creating a landing page for the contacts he generates. If after a year Hawaii shows strong results, we should roll out the campaign in other markets with large VA populations. Across these markets, there is a potential to reach 40,000 moving home buyers each year.

Partnering With Corporate Talent Teams to Reach Employees

Recruiters often help relocating new hires start their house-hunting process. We should create a program to become their recommended agent, similar to Cartus' free "Affinity Realty" service, a that strategy has won them 603,000 home purchases and sales over 27 years. Redfin should offer a landing page and discount, and perhaps light relocation support through our Relocation Coordinator. This would motivate companies to email the landing page to new hires, include a Redfin brochure in welcome packets, and include the discount on their perks page, which are surprisingly well-frequented (Redfin's page gets 1,378 unique visitors per month). Our target customers are HR and recruiting directors at 500-4,000 person companies that are tech-forward, in a city with a high home-owner rate, and not already working with an RMC. We could beat other "relocation-light" offerings by having a better technology product, refund promise, and inroads to corporate partnerships through the Workplace HBC program.

We project that over two years, one Redfin Business Ambassador could earn 40 partnerships and $240K-$720K in revenue. We should track success with by adding an "employer" tag to the Agent Tools customer profile. Annual expenses for a Redfin Business Ambassador and minimal engineering time would be ~$115,000. We have pitched an MVP to four companies and earned one soft win.

Appendix 1: Strategy to become our own RMC

After we have rolled out the strategies above and have greater internal expertise on relocation, we recommend that Redfin revisit becoming a corporate relocation management company (RMC). We believe we could build an RMC for $17.5M or buy one for $40-$100M+, making the effort akin to starting our mortgage business. If we built one, we could achieve $12M revenue in Year 5 and $80M in Year 10; if we bought one we could achieve $66-$118M revenue in Year 5 and $128-$247M in Year 10. While owning an RMC platform will be a good, high-margin business for Redfin, we think it makes sense to first get more familiar with the industry and to ensure that we have the institutional energy to excel. Becoming an RMC is a substantial growth opportunity, but it isn't fundamental to our business.

A Relocation Management Company Primer

RMCs manage corporate transferee and new hire moves. The RMCs act like general contractors for services like movement of household goods, temporary housing, and brokerage services. They subcontract all of the actual work to vendors. Most also offer white-glove upgrades like guaranteed home sale and private school placement.

Though they serve the relocatee, RMCs' real customers are corporate HR and recruiting teams, primarily at large corporations. In total, American corporations spend $15.2B paying RMCs to do an estimated 1.5M global relocations every year. RMCs charge corporations a ~$800-$2,000 fee per move. A full service move averages $25,000 for a renter and $90,000 for a homeowner. Lump sum moves vary widely, but are generally much less. An estimated ~55% of RMC relocatees are renters. 60% of RMC relocations are domestic and 40% are international. The bulk of domestic business comes from the >1,800 US companies over 10,000 people. A small portion of RMC business comes directly from non-corporate consumers; at one large RMC, ~35% of business is consumer but at others it's under 5%.

The five largest incumbent RMCs are Cartus, Brookfield, Unigroup, Sirva, and Graebel who each do between 40,000 and 170,000 moves/year, and together cover 25% of moves in the industry. The incumbent RMC model is low-tech, inefficient, and not customer-centric. These RMCs make most of their revenue from mandatory vendor "referral fees", which range from 25-50% of vendor revenue. An estimated 40% of RMC revenue is from referral fees from real estate brokerages. Incumbents are to varying extents trying to integrate technology; the most impressive is PLUS Relocation who created a platform with Salesforce.

There are two notable VC-backed "modern" RMCs. Modern RMCs are software-based, transparent, less reliant on referral fees, and promise better Redfin cultural alignment. It's likely that their gross margins look more like a SAAS business (40-50%) than an operating business. We believe that the modern RMC model will win primarily because it is a better value but also because there has been a rise in the use of lump-sum benefit packages, which can still be profitably serviced by a tech-first RMC.

| | MOVE Guides | Urbanbound |
|----------------|---|---|
| # Corp Clients | 60+ | 150+ |
| # Moves (2016) | 12,000+ | 6,000+ |
| Founded | 2011 | 2011 |
| Capital Raised | $26.5M | $14M |
| Business Model | Charge $1000/move using highly automated platform. No referral fees from vendors. One employee can serve 150 customers vs ~1:10 industry-wide. | Charge $800-1,000/move. Requires 35% referrals fees from agents. Historically focused on rental relocatees but are moving away from this. Platform and branding is tech-first. |

Why should Redfin build an RMC?

By investing $17.5M into building our own RMC, or $45-100M+ buying one, we could grow revenue, market share and margins beyond what is achievable through the strategies outlined above. In addition, it would diversify our revenue stream, enhance our core product for relocatees, and provide a path to international expansion.

A Redfin RMC platform would win by being the first to combine the modern and traditional RMC models. Traditional RMCs leveraged brokerage revenues (via referral fees or direct ownership) to subsidize their operations. Now, modern RMCs use technology to operate more efficiently and can be less expensive and more transparent. No one has yet combined the two. Urbanbound is closest since they both take a referral fee and are highly efficient, but because they are bullying their customers into using certain vendors, they are not providing the best value to the customer.

Redfin has other competitive advantages as an RMC. We could achieve better economies of scale by driving non-corporate Redfin consumers to the platform; we think Reology does this, but are not sure to what extent. We have local knowledge and “home bases” in every city. We know how to run a hybrid operating and technology business. Finally, we have relevant software architecture from tools like Walkscore and Deal Room that we could likely repurpose, allowing us to build better products faster.

RMC Option 1: Build it

A Redfin RMC would provide full relocation services, including brokerage, to both corporate customers and directly to consumers. We would create a technology-first platform, through which all relocating processes could be scheduled by the user, similar to what MOVE Guides and Urbanbound offer. We would still have a human available to help fill in any gaps. We would earn half of our revenue by charging a flat fee ($1,000/relocatee) and the other half through voluntary home buyer and seller conversion to our brokerage. We could be more profitable if we force conversion, but it is inconsistent with our brand.

The investment would be $17.5M+ with a long payback period: it is of similar magnitude and payback to the investment for mortgage. By Year 5, we would achieve significant revenue from RMC fees and brokerage deals ($13.2M/year) and blended 38% gross margins (excluding listings). By Year 10 combined revenue reaches $89M, adding almost 7% to Redfin's projected revenue. See the full financial model for more information.

We will complete more due diligence by partnering, soliciting further feedback from modern RMC customers, or becoming a customer ourselves. Once we press go, we need to raise capital and create a new business unit with their own P+L. We would start with a lighter offering of "core" services for smaller customers but, since talent teams want a full-service solution, as we grow we would need to expand our offerings.

Potential issues: It's difficult to experiment without major investment. The sales cycle for companies is ~2-3 years, so it would take several years to create a record and gain momentum. We may need to become comfortable with Buyer Value Option (BVO) transactions and holding homes on our books. BVOs are two-step home sale transaction that avoid employee taxation, but they would require a Redfin RMC to hold homes on our books for up to about a week. There are also legal concerns: RESPA contains strict prohibitions against the payment of unearned brokerage kick-backs. Additionally, affiliated business arrangements are highly regulated and subject to penalties if not in full compliance with RESPA. Several large RMC's have chosen to modify key business relationships to avoid legal action. Finally there are brand concerns: as an RMC, we would have sway, but not total control, over vendors.

RMC Option 2: Buy it

While building an RMC requires less initial capital and boasts better MOIC, buying one is better from a speed-to-market, NPV valuation, and institutional “energy” perspective. The two most likely acquisition targets are Urbanbound or MOVE Guides. The gross margins for both acquisitions are similar to the “build it” model of 38%, but the scale of revenue at each year is different for each company based upon their 2017 starting point. See the full financial model.

| Company | 2017 Acquisition price | 2020 Revenue* | NPV | (+) | (-) |
|-------------|------------------------|---------------|------|----------------------------------|--------------------------------------|
| Urbanbound | $40-50 | $73 | $17 | Domestic, digestible | Uncertain about efficiency |
| MOVE guides | $100-110 | $131 | $29 | Cultural fit and strong traction | Big ambitions/ difficult acquisition |

Appendix 2: New Role Descriptions

Relocation Coordinator (RC)- This would be a salaried position, located in Seattle or in the HUB. The RC will be competent in booking tours, phone calls, neighborhood consultations or listing consultations for any Redfin market. They will also be familiar with our relocation-specific resources, such as deals for movement of household goods on Marketplace, Opportunity Score, and how to direct customers to our neighborhood pages. The RC will handle relocating customers that Support Agents first touch as well as relocating contacts that submit agent requests for their secondary market. The RC will intake inquiries from Facebook, mailer and email marketing campaigns and convert the contacts to appointments. RCs would be a point of contact for a MOVE Guides (or other RMC) partnerships and would manage client assignments sourced from the Business Ambassador Program. The proposed salary is $50k but the cost isn’t included in our plan because it’s a role similar to Support Agent and is already baked into gross margin assumptions in cost per deal. In the near-term, RCs would likely be part-time Support Agents who have been trained for some of these functions. Finally, if the Redfin VIP program gets implemented, these coordinators would be the same as, or part of, that team.

Redfin Business Ambassador- Will seek out new business by targeting decision makers in HR and recruiting groups nationwide. The salary would include a larger commission-based component. This person might also be involved in creating and maintaining a partnership with an RMC.
